When Gill Lund returns to Castle Dale, Utah after his father's death, he intends to stay three days. Long enough to bury the man, settle the estate, and go back to the life he built on the other side of twelve years and a lot of open country.

The town has other plans.

His father—quiet, stubborn, not a man who explained himself—had been driving into the desert at odd hours, tending water caches hidden in the San Rafael Swell. Desert travelers in desperate need. Small mercies, unmarked and unannounced. Until someone found them and destroyed them, methodically, with bleach and a serrated blade.

The evidence leads somewhere no one in Castle Dale wants to look. And the more Gill asks, the more he understands that his father's silence wasn't indifference—it was the posture of a man who had already paid the cost of speaking plainly in a small town, and who kept doing the work anyway.

Gill is a photojournalist. He knows how to document things. What he doesn't know yet is whether he's willing to be part of the story.

Greg Maxfield is a native Emery County, Utah, where the desert teaches him patience and the land holds his memories. A native of the American West, he spent three decades in the energy industry before turning full-time to writing. He studied the history and geography of the American Southwest, has volunteered with Native American elders, and believes that place leaves something permanent in us—marks we carry long after we've left. He lives in the Pacific Northwest and writes about the landscapes that shaped him.
